Gerry Weber:
Lifelong defender of civil liberties

For the past 16 years, Gerald R. "Gerry" Weber Jr. (J.D.'89) has devoted his life to the cause of civil liberties and the enforcement of civil rights.

As former legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia, an institution he describes as the Constitution's "watchdog and protector," Weber has represented people of all backgrounds who needed help when "the government crossed the constitutional line."

For Weber, any given day at the ACLU included litigation, media interviews and meetings with coalition partners. During his 16 years of service, his biggest accomplishments were "expanding the legal program to one of the biggest in the country and helping so many clients stand tall and fight for their rights."

While he has tried countless cases for the ACLU in both the state and federal trial and appellate courts, in his last year he achieved a record of .842 (16 wins in 19 cases), which is "about as good as it gets in civil rights law." Some of his most memorable cases included representing students in a fifth-grade class who were strip searched to recover a missing $26, a blind man barred from voting because of his disability and a homeless man arrested for "urban camping" who went on to college.

Weber believes the impact of the work done at the ACLU can be felt across the country. While individuals often label the ACLU a "liberal" group, he thinks the ACLU is all about freedom, and "everyone should relate to that."

"Our Bill of Rights is there for the little guy, the outsider, the unpopular one. I truly believe the ACLU's work breathes life into the Bill of Rights, and without it, the document would become some nice phrases that make us all feel good about ourselves but never test our tolerance for difference."

While Weber's tenure at the ACLU has ended, it does not mean his career in the law has come to a close. He is currently working part time as senior staff counsel for the Southern Center for Human Rights, a public interest law organization dedicated to enforcing the civil and human rights of people in the criminal justice system in the South. In this position, he handles cases dealing with a variety of topics, including a person's right to a lawyer and the death penalty, and he hopes to expand the SCHR's work into "new and unchartered seas."

Additionally, he will be devoting more time to his own private practice, the Law Offices of Gerald Weber. Weber's firm, which focuses on constitutional law, has represented clients ranging from physicians who object to doctors participating in capital punishment to citizens arrested for monitoring police surveillance. He said he is thrilled to be broadening his practice areas since it has "allowed him to spread his wings and challenge himself in new ways."

While Weber's schedule seems rather full, he still finds time to enrich the minds of law students as an adjunct law professor at Emory and Georgia State universities, positions he has held for more than a decade.

For Weber, the law can be defined as one "never-ending learning experience." Whether it has been representing victims of racial profiling to filing a lawsuit to save one of the oldest trees inside Interstate 285, he has always found that the law presents new challenges on a daily basis.

"I love legal problems that test your legal imagination. Finding that obscure statute, the antiquated case, the theory that no one has ever tried ... it's what makes law a challenge and a creative process."

Frank LoMonte: Reverting back to journalistic roots

After working 12 years in the journalism industry, with nine of those being spent as a bureau chief for the Morris News Service in Atlanta and two as a Washington, D.C., correspondent, Frank D. LoMonte (J.D.'00) decided to leave the field of journalism to embark on a career in the law.

Having spent a considerable amount of time around courts and the lawmaking process as a reporter, LoMonte felt a transition to law would be natural, as he had learned law and journalism often go hand in hand.

"Anyone who has a love for the printed word can't help but be fascinated by the power of the law and the fact that a few words written on a page can create a valuable right or waive one."

Ten years later, after serving as a law clerk for two federal judges and as an attorney at a large law firm, LoMonte is formally combining the legal and journalistic experience he has amassed as the executive director of the Student Press Law Center, a national legal-assistance agency for student journalists.

The Student Press Law Center's mission is to help student journalists and instructors at the college and high school levels understand and protect their legal rights. Additionally, when necessary, the SPLC provides counsel to groups who have legal issues and then assists volunteer attorneys in bringing these cases through the trial and appellate courts.

LoMonte believes the work done at the SPLC is invaluable because it educates student journalists about certain issues that will be important to them when they pursue careers in the field.

"Many of the students the SPLC serves are preparing for a future in journalism. Student journalists perform a valuable watchdog function and understanding the constitutional and statutory rights that protect them is vital to their success."

In his new position as executive director, which started in January, LoMonte plans to broaden the organization's ties within the legal community and to use his law firm experience to improve the level of support the group offers to pro bono attorneys.

Additionally, he would like to work more with students and educators to find ways the SPLC's services can be more available to them, as these individuals and their publications play an integral role in every day life.

"As a former student journalist, who spent far too many hours in the newsroom, I have a deep appreciation for how a robust student publication can benefit the community. Additionally, I truly understand the sacrifice that journalism instructors make and the risks they take when they let students publish edgy material. I appreciate those small acts of heroism, and I'm proud to defend them."

Prior to his appointment at the SPLC, LoMonte spent four years at Sutherland Asbill & Brennan. One of his biggest career accomplishments came after spending three years trying to break down regulatory barriers that hampered independent power producers from building renewable-energy electric plants in Georgia, in particular biomass plants. When he started in 2004, there were zero commercial biomass plants, and now, there are at least seven under development.

As LoMonte transitions into his position at the SPLC, he plans to use the following lesson he learned at Georgia Law: "Be prepared. You won't always win, but you'll always walk in the door with confidence. You'll never embarrass your client or your firm, and you'll sleep at night knowing you did your best."
