

Opportunities in Animal Law

The Animal Legal Defense Fund (ALDF) is a non-profit organization that works to protect the lives and advance the interests of animals through the legal system.

Part 1: Law Student Opportunities

Animal Law Clerkship Program

Each summer, fall, and spring, several promising law students are given the opportunity to learn more about animal law by participating in the ALDF Animal Law Clerkship Program. Positions are available with our Criminal Justice Program, where the primary focus is on criminal cases involving animal cruelty, or our Litigation Program, where the primary focus is on civil animal law issues.

Animal Law Scholarship Program

Each year ALDF awards a limited number of “Advancement of Animal Law Scholarships” to SALDF members entering their second or third year of law school who have demonstrated outstanding commitment to animal law and ALDF’s mission while in law school and anticipate participating in the field after graduation. Scholarship awards are in the amount of $2,500 or $5,000. The application guidelines can be found on our website.

Publishing Opportunities

Because animal law intersects with so many other “traditional” areas of law, there are myriad publishing opportunities in academic law journals. However, there are currently seven journals with an animal law focus:

- Animal Law Review (Lewis and Clark College)
- The Journal of Animal Law (Michigan State University)
- The Journal of Animal Law and Ethics (University of Pennsylvania)
- Stanford Journal of Animal Law and Policy (Stanford University) – online journal
- Journal of Animal and Environmental Law (University of Louisville Brandeis School of Law)
- Global Journal of Animal Law (Åbo Akademi University Department of Law, Finland) – online journal
- Journal of International Wildlife Law and Policy (Taylor and Francis)

ALDF Email Lists

Students can subscribe to ALDF's law student email list and receive information about:

- employment, internship, and volunteer opportunities
- grants and scholarships
- educational opportunities
- upcoming animal law events
- writing contests
- case updates
- chapter project ideas

ALDF Law Student Membership

ALDF offers a special membership for law students (dues are $15 per year).

Membership benefits include:

- ALDF's print newsletter, The Animals' Advocate
- Subscription to Animal Law Review – the first animal law journal, run by Lewis & Clark Law School students

We also offer a complimentary one-year attorney membership in ALDF to recent law graduates. The application can be found in the back of this booklet or at <http://www.aldf.org/free-membership>.

ALDF's Anti-Cruelty Team (ACT)

Students can also sign up for ALDF's Anti-Cruelty Team (ACT) and receive urgent updates on cruelty cases around the country, and what they can do to help win justice for animals. Letters, emails, and phone calls from concerned members of the public often make the crucial difference for animals in cases of criminal animal cruelty. Students can sign up for these lists at <http://www.aldf.org/stayinformed>.

Student Animal Legal Defense Fund (SALDF)

SALDF chapters are law student groups that are affiliated with ALDF and share its mission – to protect the lives and advance the interests of animals through the legal system. Within recent years, interest in the growing field of animal law has virtually exploded.

By way of comparison, there were only 12 SALDF chapters in 2000. Twelve years later, there are 192, including chapters at the top ten U.S. law schools. There are also many international chapters. Today's SALDF members will be instrumental in advancing legal protections for animals as tomorrow's animal protection lawyers, prosecutors, and judges. Many scholars compare animal law today to the emergent environmental law movement thirty years ago.

The steps required to form an SALDF chapter vary depending on each law school's requirements for student groups, but the process is very easy. ALDF has created materials to help with the process, including sample by-laws, chapter requirements, and a step-by-step guide to forming a chapter. These materials can be downloaded from our website: <http://aldf.org/resources/law-professional-law-student-resources/law-students-saldf-chapters/how-to-start-a-saldf-chapter-at-your-school/>.

SALDF chapters find many creative ways to contribute to the animal law movement: working with their school to add an animal law course to the curriculum (more than 140 law schools have offered such a class; a list of law schools that have offered an animal law course is included in this packet), inviting speakers to talk about various issues, screening films, raising money for local rescue organizations, and so on.

Through ALDF's student chapter grants program, established SALDF groups can apply for funding from ALDF to support these and other student chapter projects, including travel to animal law conferences and competitions. Events like the Annual Animal Law Conference at Lewis & Clark Law School, ALDF's Future of Animal Law conference, and the National Animal Law Advocacy Competitions at Harvard Law School are wonderful educational and networking opportunities for students interested in animal law. Our SALDF grants program provides support to chapter members by helping with travel costs associated with attending these events. The grant guidelines and application can be downloaded from our website: www.aldf.org/grants.

Because animal law intersects with many other areas of the law, there are countless opportunities for collaboration with other student groups when seeking to organize a speaker panel or other event. Here are just a few examples:

- Environmental Law Society: Factory Farms and Water/Air Pollution
- National Lawyers Guild: Civil Liberties and Animal Rights Activism
- Women's Law Society: Domestic Violence and Animal Cruelty
- Human Rights Society: Slaughterhouses and Human Rights Abuses
- Criminal Law Society: Animal Cruelty Prosecution or Activist Defense
- Constitutional Law Society: Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act
- International Law Society: Wildlife

For help forming a SALDF chapter, email npallotta@aldf.org or visit www.saldf.org.

Free Materials

- Tabling materials (brochures, newsletters, stickers, posters etc.) for chapters
- “Animal Law and the Curriculum” packet and other resources for course advocacy

Other Resources:

The Center for Animal Law Studies at Lewis and Clark Law School

In 2008, a historic collaborative effort between the Animal Legal Defense Fund and Lewis & Clark Law School (L&C) in Portland, Oregon, brought about the creation of the Center for Animal Law Studies (CALs):

http://www.lclark.edu/law/centers/animal_law_studies/.

The Center for Animal Law Studies, in collaboration with ALDF, is an academic and scholarly Animal Law program dedicated to:

1. Training future leaders for careers in Animal Law and public policy;
2. Conducting high-quality, independent legal research that advances the field of Animal Law;
3. Developing innovative recommendations and legal strategies relating to Animal Law within administrative, legislative, litigation and other settings;
4. Creating a scholarly environment where students, regardless of particular point of view, feel included and respected; and
5. Ensuring that the interests of animals are always considered as the field develops.

CALS provides essential programs and services for law students under the guidance of experienced animal law professors and ALDF attorneys. The history between ALDF and L&C is long and rich with both institutions acting as leaders in the animal law field. L&C has been a leader in animal law since the early 1990s and currently offers the most extensive program in animal law studies. For this reason, it made perfect sense for ALDF and L&C to join forces through the creation of the CALS, a first-of-its-kind venture.

The L.L.M. Program at Lewis and Clark Law School

In 2012, L&C began to offer the world’s first advanced legal degree in Animal Law. For more information about the L.L.M. Program, contact Natasha Dolezal at ndolezal@lclark.edu.

Part 2: Legal Professional Opportunities

Graduation and Beyond

Because interest in animal law is growing much faster than the animal law job market, we encourage students interested in animal law to “keep your options open.” The unfortunate reality is that a lot of students who go to law school to practice animal law will not be able to find paying positions in the field when they graduate. So stay open to the possibility of practicing some other kind of law that may implicate animal protection indirectly, such as: environmental law, family law, free speech law, or criminal law. Or consider doing animal law as a pro bono side project. One way to do this is to join ALDF’s Animal Law Program and become part of our growing pro bono network. Our attorney members help with:

- research and writing,
- citation checking,
- filing amicus briefs,
- litigating cases, and
- assisting prosecutors with animal cruelty cases.

There are a number of ways to forge a career in animal law if you keep an open mind and entrepreneurial spirit. Besides doing pro bono work for ALDF, other options include:

- Staff Attorney – Work for an animal protection group
- Private Practitioner – Devote your practice to a variety of animal related issues, including veterinary malpractice, landlord/tenant issues, trusts for companion animals, and custody disputes
- Lobbyist – Use your degree to advocate for animal-friendly legislation
- Prosecutor – Work within the criminal justice system to enforce animal cruelty laws
- Pro Bono Work – Practice and promote animal law pro bono work within your firm through ALDF’s Animal Law Program.

ALDF Animal Law Institute Litigation Fellowship

The ALDF Animal Law Institute is now offering an Animal Law Institute Litigation Fellowship. The Institute is a world-class, first-of-its-kind program that, by training classes of promising litigators in strategic impact litigation, will further ALDF's mission to protect the lives and advance the interests of all animals. The Fellow will learn to develop state and federal strategic impact litigation and legislation to better the lives and legal status of animals. The Fellow will operate as part of a team, but will ultimately be responsible for the innovation and success of his or her projects while developing litigation skills. The model applicant must have earned a J.D. within the past three years, excelled in school, earned strong work references, and have a sincere and proven interest in animal protection. The primary focus of this clerkship is on civil animal law issues, but Fellows will be exposed to criminal anti-cruelty cases as well.

ALDF Animal Law Program Attorney Membership

The ALDF would never be able to use the law to advance the interests of animals without the support of legal professionals nationwide. Attorneys can join ALDF's volunteer attorney network by completing an application found in the back of this booklet or at <http://aldf.org/attorney-membership-application/>. As an attorney member, you'll receive these membership benefits:

- ALDF's print newsletter, The Animals' Advocate
- A year's subscription to the scholarly journal, Animal Law Review
- E-mail updates on animal law related:
 - Cases & news,
 - Educational opportunities
 - Events such as conferences & academic symposiums,
 - Volunteer opportunities
 - And employment opportunities at various law firms & non-profit organizations across the country

To request more information about ALDF's Animal Law Program, please e-mail alp@aldf.org.

New Law Graduate Attorney Membership Application

Congratulations to recent graduates and those of you graduating from law school this semester. ALDF wants to support and encourage your dedication to the field of animal law by offering you free attorney membership in ALDF's Animal Law Program for one year. We also invite you to join our pro bono attorney network. When you fill out the special application for new graduates included in the back pocket of this booklet or found at <http://www.aldf.org/free-membership> you will join this growing volunteer network, which is a great way to stay involved with ALDF's mission after graduation. New law graduate attorney members will also receive the membership benefits offered to our attorney members.

ALDF's Anti-Cruelty Team (ACT)

Attorney members can also sign up for ALDF's Anti-Cruelty Team (ACT) and receive urgent updates on cruelty cases around the country, and what they can do to help win justice for animals. Letters, emails, and phone calls from concerned members of the public often make the crucial difference for animals in cases of criminal animal cruelty. You can sign up for these lists at <http://www.aldf.org/stayinformed>.

Law Professional Resources

The Animal Legal Defense Fund has numerous resources for law professionals interested in the field of animal law. Examples of the type of assistance available are included below.

Animal Law Instructor

ALDF's Animal Law Program works closely with law students and law professionals to advance the emerging field of animal law. Moving toward the day when animal law is part of the curriculum at each and every law school, the Animal Law Program collaborates with students, faculty, and school administrations to facilitate the development of animal law courses. ALDF provides comprehensive resource guidance to individuals interested in teaching animal law, including casebooks, sample exams, sample syllabi, articles of interest and networking opportunities.

Law Firm Pro Bono Coordinator

ALDF partners with pro bono coordinators interested in developing animal law volunteer opportunities at their firms. The practice of animal law allows for increasingly more opportunities to set precedent and develop cutting-edge legal theories. ALDF works with many of the largest law firms in the country.

Bar Association Animal Law Sections and Committees

ALDF works with bar association members interested in forming committees and/or sections that deal exclusively with animal law. Contact information for regional, state, and national animal law sections and committees, including the American Bar Association Tort Trial & Insurance Practice Section Animal Law Committee, can be found at <http://www.aldf.org/bar>.

Attorney Blogs

ALDF's Blog features summaries of animal law cases brought by ALDF, ALDF attorney members, and other practicing attorneys. Additionally, the blog highlights important legal cases and developments at the state, federal, and international level. More information can be found at <http://aldf.org/blog>.

Research Tools (available at www.aldf.org)

Animal Protection Laws of the United States of America & Canada

This is the must-have resource for lawyers, law professors, law students, legislators, other legal professionals, and anyone who wants the most comprehensive animal protection laws collection of its kind available.

Model Animal Protection Laws Collection

ALDF's Model Animal Protection Laws Collection includes definitions of terms, general prohibitions, defenses, pre- and post-conviction provisions, and other provisions.

Legal Advocates' Manual for Animal Abuse Criminal Cases

The Legal Advocates' Manual for Animal Abuse Criminal Cases was written to help attorneys and others become effective advocates for animals while working with their local prosecutors' offices.

U.S. Jurisdictions With and Without Felony Animal Cruelty Provisions

This is a current list of U.S. jurisdictions with and without felony animal cruelty provisions.

Solutions to Long-Term Cases in States Without Pre-Conviction Forfeiture Provision

Pre-conviction forfeiture is important so that the animal victims do not waste away in cages indefinitely but are instead allowed to be placed into loving homes.

Dealing with Aggressive Dogs: Community Solutions That Consider Each Dog, Not Their Breed

This addresses the issue of aggressive dogs in a non-breed-specific fashion, focusing on the behavior of individual dogs, not on their breed.

Animal Fighting Facts

This comprehensive resource discusses the most common types of animal fighting, issues common to animal fighting cases, state and federal laws, and prosecuting animal fighting crimes.

Animal Neglect Facts

Animal neglect is the failure to provide basic care required for an animal to thrive. This document contains information about federal and state law, county/city ordinances, resources, and case studies.

Animal Hoarding Facts

Hoarding is one of the most egregious forms of animal cruelty, affecting tens of thousands of animals – mostly cats and dogs – in communities nationwide. Find out how to spot it and what you can do to stop it.

Confronting Animal Neglect - An ALDF Report on Current Law and Future Possibilities

The Animal Legal Defense Fund has issued an all-new report reviewing the status of the laws of each state in the country by chronicling both their statutes and case law as they relate to animal neglect.

The Crime of Bestiality/Zoophilia: Sexual Assault of an Animal

Although it's a taboo subject, sexual crimes against animals are not exceptional, isolated incidents. Find out which states have no direct prohibitions against the sexual assault of an animal and examples of past cases.

Canadian Animal Protection Laws Rankings

A new study released by the Animal Legal Defense Fund underscores the often-considerable differences that exist between the animal protection laws of the provinces and territories.

State Animal Protection Laws Rankings

This report - the only one of its kind in the nation - ranks the animal protection laws of every state based on their relative strength and general comprehensiveness.

Databases – Laws & Cases, Pleadings & Briefs

Created in partnership with the Animal Legal & Historical Web Center, ALDF provides attorneys with access to databases for animal laws, cases, pleadings and briefs. Attorneys can research issues by state, topic, subject, species, or country at <http://www.animallaw.info/>.

Attorneys can obtain pleadings and briefs on a variety of topics including the Animal Welfare Act, breed specific legislation, pet custody, horse slaughter, zoo regulations, dogfighting and pet damages on request at <http://aldf.org/about-us/programs/criminal-justice-program/>.

The Practice of Animal Law

The following is a collection of articles you may find helpful in considering the practice of animal law.

Animal Law and Your Practice

By Pamela Hart

Michael Vick. Hurricane Katrina. Pet food recall. These events have magnified the gap between how the legal system treats animals and the significant role that animals play in people's lives. As a result, more and more attorneys are using their legal expertise to close this gap in the rapidly emerging field of animal law.

During the past several years, animal law has gained a stronger foothold in the mainstream legal arena. This shift is reflected both in academia and in legal practice. For example, in 2000 there were only nine animal law courses being offered at ABA-accredited law schools. Currently there are more than 100 such courses. Similarly, in 2000 there were 12 Student Animal Law Defense Fund (SALDF) chapters. Currently, there are more than 140 SALDF chapters across the United States and Canada.

Not only has there been a surge in the interest in animal law at the academic level, but attorneys are now finding ways to incorporate animal law into their legal practices. This relatively new phenomenon highlights the ways in which animal law intersects with "traditional" areas of the law, such as tort, contract, criminal, and constitutional law. Examples of this intersection include animal custody disputes in divorces or separations; veterinary malpractice cases; housing disputes involving "no pets" policies and discrimination laws; damages cases involving the wrongful death or injury to a companion animal; and enforceable trusts for companion animals.

At first blush, this overlap may not appear obvious, but one need only reflect on the cases that have made the headlines during the past few years to realize that the complex and dynamic field of animal law is here to stay. The intersection of animal law with other areas of law, along with the recognition of the special bond between humans and animals, provides a vast array of opportunities for making money while practicing animal law. The following examples suggest ways in which animal law can be incorporated into a legal practice:

- Estate planning. Animal lovers or not, most Americans probably shared a similar reaction when they learned that Leona Helmsley had left $12 million to her dog, Trouble. This was an extreme example of estate planning for companion animals, but more and more clients are looking for ways in which their non-human loved ones can be taken care of after their passing. Currently, 38 states and the District of Columbia allow for companion animal trusts. This area of the law offers a unique opportunity to provide cutting-edge legal advice and expertise to your new and existing trust and estate planning clientele.
- Custody disputes. Another area of practice with enormous potential for providing animal law expertise involves custody disputes over companion animals. With the divorce rate on the rise, statistics show divorcing couples are willing to invest time and resources to negotiate over who gets custody of Fido or Fluffy. In fact, courts are increasingly ruling on what should happen to companion animals in divorce cases, including which partner should get custody.

- Tort claims. An increasing number of companion animal guardians are bringing tort claims against those who either intentionally or negligently harm their beloved family members. These cases include, but are not limited to, claims against veterinarians, groomers, kennel operators, neighbors, and police officers who shoot dogs. Although such claims have not yet yielded the high-dollar judgments seen in human tort claims, progressively more judgments are being made in favor of companion animal guardians.
- Free speech cases. First Amendment free speech cases for animal activists who have been denied the right to protest or leaflet present another avenue for practitioners to offer their legal services. Both the federal and state laws have attorney fees provisions. (See 42 U.S.C. § 1988; Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1021.5.) Moreover, attorney fees can be negotiated as part of a settlement. These cases have the potential to offer a stable source of income for legal practitioners.
- Animal law courses. Of the 200 ABA-approved law schools in the United States, more than 100 currently offer animal law classes and seminars. These classes are taught mainly by adjunct professors—usually prominent animal law practitioners from the local community. If you live reasonably near one of the remaining 100 law schools, you have an opportunity to teach animal law.

The above examples are not meant to be exhaustive, and with the growth in animal law showing no signs of stopping, there will be increasingly more opportunities to engage in this dynamic and cutting-edge area of the law. Additionally, for lawyers who feel saddened, frustrated, and outraged when confronted with headlines such as those involving Michael Vick, Hurricane Katrina, or the pet food recall, practicing animal law offers a unique and meaningful way to merge your profession with your passion for animals.

Pamela Hart is director of the Animal Law Program at the Animal Legal Defense Fund (www.aldf.org), a national non-profit organization that works to protect the lives and advance the interests of animals through the legal system. Additionally, she is a lecturer in law at the University of Chicago, teaching the first animal law course offered there. You may reach Pamela Hart at pdhart@aldf.org.

This article is reprinted with permission from GP Solo, Volume 26, Number 5, July/August 2009.

Making Animal Law Your Career*

by Joyce Tischler, ALDF founding director

In a recent article on CareerBuilder.com, entitled “10 Hot Jobs for 2007,” the #2 listed job was “Animal Defense Lawyer.” That elicited laughter from some of the attorneys who are currently trying to make a living in the still nascent field of animal law. A growing number of law students and attorneys want to become animal law specialists, but the supply of jobs lags behind the demand and most attorneys consign animal work to their pro bono hours. I spoke with some of our colleagues and the news from the front is: there is good reason to have hope. Where are all of those “hot” animal law jobs? They are out there, but not necessarily where you might think.

Working for Animal Protection Agencies

In the twenty-six years since I began practicing animal law, the landscape has changed markedly. In 1980, there were about a half dozen attorneys employed by animal protection organizations. Today, most of the large national and an increasing number of regional and local animal protection groups employ lawyers in a variety of capacities, as litigators, lobbyists, corporate counsel and program staff. Some groups offer one year fellowships to recent law graduates, as well as clerkships and internships for law students. The Animal Legal Defense Fund, Physician’s Committee for Responsible Medicine, ASPCA and PETA all employ staff attorneys. The Humane Society of the U.S. employs ten attorneys in its Animal Protection Litigation unit and an additional twenty work elsewhere within the agency.

Working for Governmental Agencies

Some aspiring animal lawyers would not consider working for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Land Management, or a state fish and wildlife agency, for fear that they would be sanctioning the exploitation of animals. However, consider that working for such agencies provides a good education about the application of the relevant law and would enable you to offer a perspective that might not otherwise be heard within the agency. In some governmental positions, you don’t have to leave your values at home. In her “free” time, Leslie Hamilton is a partner in a new law firm that focuses on animal law. In her “paying job” with a county Corporation Counsel, Hamilton provides legal counsel to the county human services department, yet she has been able to focus on a surprising amount of animal law. For example, when the local humane society, under contract with the county, seizes an animal based on an alleged violation of the anti-cruelty law, the owner is notified of their right to contest the seizure. Within the scope of her paid position, Hamilton files a petition, asking the court to transfer ownership of the animal to the humane society. When the local City Attorney brings a dangerous dog case, the Board of Health holds an administrative hearing. Hamilton is assigned to serve as the attorney for the Board of Health, to advise the Board on matters of law and to draft the Board’s decisions. Hamilton has been able to transfer the knowledge that she has gained in child custody proceedings to help the local humane society develop similar forms for use in animal protection proceedings: notice of seizure, notice of protective custody and abatement. She has also worked on several cases where evidence developed during an animal neglect investigation was used in a related child protection or public health enforcement matter. Hamilton advises the county department of land and water resources, where she has recently drafted ordinances regulating some aspects of confined animal feeding operations located within the county. Every municipality of any size has some animal law work. Those who choose this route can find out where the “animal” work is and offer to handle it. You may be surprised at how much animal related work you will be engaged in.

Teaching Animal Law Classes and Seminars; Starting an Animal Law Clinic

Of the 194 ABA approved law schools in the U.S., over 70 currently offer animal law classes and seminars. These classes are taught mainly by adjunct professors- usually prominent animal law practitioners from the local community. If you live reasonably near one of the remaining 124 law schools, you have an opportunity to teach animal law. ALDF provides resources and advice on how to start an animal law class as well as how to start a clinic, so if this interests you, contact Pamela Hart (pdhart@aldf.org). For a listing of animal law classes and bar association animal law sections, check the ALDF web site: www.aldf.org, Animal Law Program.

Attorneys in Private Practice

The sharpest increase in the number of paid animal law practitioners has been in the private sector. I spoke with Adam Karp of Seattle, WA, Corey Evans and Geneva Page of San Francisco and Howard Crystal of Meyer Glitzenstein & Crystal in Washington, DC, who provided a variety of practical ideas:

- Specialize. These practitioners agree that if you try to cover all aspects of animal law, you will be dabbling and are less likely to provide meaningful service to your clients. For example, Karp focuses on personal injury and custody cases; when he gets calls about trusts for companion animals, he refers them to an animal law attorney who does estate planning.
- Statutory attorneys’ fee provisions. Evans and Page handle First Amendment free speech cases for animal activists who have been denied the right to protest or leaflet. Both the federal and state laws have attorneys’ fees provisions (See, 42 U.S.C. Sec. 1988; Cal. Code Civ. Proc. Sec. 1021.5) and attorneys’ fees can be negotiated as part of a settlement. These cases offer a stable source of income for their business. Evans and Page also handle California Public Records Act claims (See, Cal. Gov. Code Sec. 6250 et seq.), where an animal activist requests records and is either denied access or provided with inadequate records. In California, where they practice, attorneys’ fees are mandatory, if the filing of the lawsuit causes the release of any requested records.
- Charge an hourly rate, even if it is significantly reduced. Taking cases on a contingency or pro bono basis is a primary cause of burnout among animal law practitioners.
- Stake out new territory. Select a metropolitan area of a state in which there are no or few other animal law practitioners.
- Advertise that you practice animal law. Additionally, write articles for bar association news publications, trade journals and publications of animal control agencies and humane societies.

- Network. Participate in local, state and the ABA animal law sections. If your state Bar association doesn't have an animal law section yet, form one. Contact Pamela Hart (e-mail address, above) for ALDF's Bar Section Starter Kit.

One Thing Leads To Another

Both Jane Hoffman and Meena Alagappan started by volunteering for the New York City Bar Association's Committee on Legal Issues Pertaining to Animals ("NYC Bar Committee"). Alagappan's volunteer work led her to get a Masters degree in Animals and Public Policy from Tufts University School of Veterinary Medicine, which led her to become a paid consultant for the Animal Welfare Trust. And, that led her to become the Executive Director of HEART, Humane Education Advocates Reaching Teachers, a new nonprofit agency whose mission is "to inspire and empower educators to implement humane education into school curricula and programs." Alagappan cautions that "a lot of what I've done, I've not been paid for, but you can create your own position and direction."

Jane Hoffman is a founding member of the NYC Bar Committee, while her law practice focused on executive compensation and estate planning. Her volunteer efforts led Hoffman and her Bar colleagues to form a not-for-profit that is "working with the City of New York toward the day when no NYC dog or cat ... is killed merely because he or she does not have a home." Their group, called the Mayor's Alliance for New York City's Animals, has over 100 participating members, including shelters and rescue groups, and Hoffman now serves as its Executive Director. Relationships that were formed through her pro bono Bar work helped her to raise the funds needed to implement the agency's ten year strategic plan. She advises: "create your own opportunities by putting yourself in places where those opportunities will become apparent to you." Both Alagappan and Hoffman stated that their training and experience as attorneys helps them in various aspects of their new jobs.

Be Proactive

The field of animal law is young, but it is growing fast. Each of the colleagues I interviewed is building a career that enables him or her to help and protect animals, in ways that are exciting and innovative. These interviews have opened my eyes to new possibilities. The key to finding those "hot" jobs is to be creative, flexible and, most of all, entrepreneurial.

*An edited version of this article appeared in the American Bar Association TIPS Animal Law Committee Newsletter, Winter 2007, at 20-22.

Joyce Tischler is the Founding Director of the Animal Legal Defense Fund (ALDF). The author wishes to thank the following colleagues for graciously sharing their insights: Meena Alagappan, Sarah Babcock, Howard Crystal, Corey Evans, David Favre, Bee Friedlander, Leslie Hamilton, Jane Hoffman, Adam Karp, Stacy Lilly, Jonathan Lovvorn, Gilda Mariani and Geneva Page.

Q&A with ALDF Staff Attorney about Pursuing a Career in Animal Law

ALDF Staff Attorney Matthew Liebman answered a few questions for the Brandeis University Law Journal about the Animal Legal Defense Fund and working in animal law. In this interview, Matthew offers some insights for undergraduates who are interested in pursuing careers in this field.

Q: How did you get involved in animal protection law?

A: I've always had affection for animals, but my real interest in animal issues started in high school when I got a little parrot named Chaplin as a pet. (I have since learned the horrors of the pet trade and would never again purchase an animal from a pet store.) My relationship with Chaplin was pretty formative, and it really opened my eyes to the complexity and individual personality of each animal. I remember realizing one day how strange it was to have so much compassion for this bird while I ate other birds! So I became a vegetarian in high school in 1995. When I got to college, I read Peter Singer's book Animal Liberation, which got me thinking about animal issues in a deeper and more philosophical way. I majored in philosophy and wrote my thesis on animal ethics through a postmodernist lens. I considered pursuing a PhD in philosophy with a continuing focus on philosophies of animality, but I decided I could probably do more good for animals as an attorney. So I went to Stanford Law School and became involved with the Animal Legal Defense Fund. After I graduated, the Fund offered me a position, which I jumped on.

Q: How can students become most effectively involved in animal welfare? Do you have any advice for those interested in studying animal protection law?

A: Students can become active by educating their peers on animal protection issues, volunteering with local animal rights groups or shelters, and attending protests and demonstrations. Law students in particular can join their schools' Student Animal Legal Defense Fund chapters; we have student chapters at 149 law schools. These groups find all kinds of creative ways to contribute to the animal law movement: getting their school to add an animal law course (as 119 law schools now do), inviting speakers to talk about various issues, screening films, raising money for local rescue organizations, and so on.

My advice to students interested in animal law is "Keep your options open." Interest in animal law is growing much faster than the animal law job market. The unfortunate reality is that a lot of students who go to law school to practice animal law will not be able to find paying positions in the field when they graduate. So stay open to the possibility of practicing some other kind of law that may implicate animal protection indirectly: environmental law, family law, free speech law, criminal law. Or consider doing animal law as a pro bono side project. I certainly don't want to discourage anyone from becoming an animal protection attorney, but I also don't want people to have unrealistic expectations. I do think the field of animal law will continue to grow, even if not quite as quickly as the number of interested students.

Q: In my experience, people generally assume that being an animal lawyer is not a financially viable career path. As someone who is involved in this field, do you think there is an increasing career potential in animal protection law?

A: Like all public interest lawyers, animal protection lawyers don't get the kind of salaries that those who work for large corporate firms get. I have classmates who make three times what I make. But obviously we're not in it for the money, and we do make a living. Law students who are interested in public interest law should seriously consider attending a school with a strong loan repayment program. Law school is very expensive, and paying off your loans on a public interest salary is almost impossible without some kind of assistance. So ask your prospective law schools what kind of loan relief they offer to graduates who practice public interest law. I certainly couldn't meet my loan payments if Stanford didn't have a robust loan repayment assistance program.

Q: What do you feel are the biggest advancements made in animal law in recent years?

A: Probably the single biggest advance is the growth of animal law as a legitimate discipline within law schools. Every new idea faces the challenge of making itself heard, and I think we've come a long way in doing that for animal law. The ALDF has worked hard to support law students and law professors who are interested in its study and, as a result, the numbers of student chapters and animal law courses have grown drastically in the last decade. Animal law has become a respectable focus, and some of the most esteemed names in law have shown an interest in it: Richard Delgado, Alan Dershowitz, Angela Harris, William Kunstler, Martha Nussbaum, Richard Posner, Cass Sunstein, Larry Tribe. There are now several casebooks and law journals dedicated to animal law, marking it as a real field of academic inquiry.

On the litigation side of things, we've won some important cases. In ALDF v. Woodley, we used a little-known North Carolina law to rescue hundreds of dogs from a breeder and hoarder who kept the animals in unimaginably inhumane conditions. We've increased the amount of farmed animal cases we bring, drawing attention to the cruelties associated with the production of meat, eggs, and dairy products. On the legislation side, we've worked to strengthen animal cruelty laws nationwide, and heavily supported California's Proposition 2, which will phase out some of the cruelest forms of intensive confinement for farmed animals.

Q: You are currently co-authoring a book on comparative and international animal law, an area that I once tried to research, and could find nearly nothing on. Do you think the efforts aimed at international animal protection are going to be a growing movement?

A: There is definitely an increasing interest in animal issues globally. A lot of animal protection advocates are realizing that corporate globalization makes it impossible for them to restrict their focus to their own locale. For example, the animal research industry has begun outsourcing projects to China, where animals are cheaper, regulations are lax, and animal rights activists are muzzled by authoritarian limits on protest. Networks are starting to develop between activists and attorneys around the world, so as the industries are globalizing, so too is the animal protection movement. And some of the most interesting and progressive policies are arising in places you wouldn't expect: Bolivia recently banned the use of animals in circuses; the tiny European nation of San Marino banned all animal research; India banned the captivity of elephants in circuses and zoos; New Zealand essentially banned all research on great apes, and several other countries followed. These are exciting developments.

Q: Do you think the laws that currently exist provide enough leverage for lawyers to adequately pursue animal protection cases?

A: Existing animal laws are woefully inadequate. The federal Humane Methods of Livestock Slaughter Act, which is supposed to minimize suffering during slaughter, does not apply to birds, which make up ninety percent of the animals killed for food. The federal Animal Welfare Act, which is supposed to protect animals in laboratories, does not cover rats and mice, which make up ninety percent of the animals used in research. And most state animal cruelty laws exempt animals used in research and raised for food. So the laws we have cover only a tiny portion of the suffering humans inflict on animals. Large-scale industrial exploitation of animals is routine and, in most cases, completely legal.

That said, I do believe there are some favorable laws that provide opportunities to improve the lives of animals. Despite the shortcomings I just mentioned, the ALDF has litigated and won plenty of cases over the years in which we've saved hundreds and hundreds of animals from deplorable conditions. So there are certainly opportunities to use existing laws to help animals, but there is no question we need more of them.

The relationship between law and society is complicated, but generally, law follows social change; it rarely produces social change. So unless we have a grassroots movement that changes the prevailing cultural denigration of animal interests, we're going to have a hard time winning significant legal victories. But the good news is that society is much further along that path than the existing laws might suggest: polls show that most people see their companion animals as family members, even though the law sees them as mere property. So the legal system is struggling to keep up with rapidly changing social attitudes toward animals. If we can continue to make social progress, I'm optimistic that legal progress will follow.

Reprinted with permission from the Brandeis University Law Journal. The Journal, one of the country's few undergraduate legal research publications, featured this interview in its Spring 2010 issue.