

Law School Life

Students tour major job markets

Organized by the Career Development Office, first-year students visited Atlanta, New York City and Washington, D.C., during spring break to learn about living and working in the metropolitan areas. Students visiting Washington, D.C., had the opportunity to visit the U.S. Department of Justice.

Chambliss brings in congressional colleagues

Former U.S. Sen. Saxby Chambliss returned to the School of Law as the Sanders Political Leadership Scholar, teaching a class titled Political Leadership and the Law. During the course, Chambliss invited U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham (above, right) and former U.S. Sen. Tom Coburn (below) to speak to students about their experiences serving in Congress.

Sea Island Scholars selected

Third-year students Kristen Murphey and Toni Wormald (right) were selected as Sea Island Scholars. Through this initiative, they received unique experiential learning opportunities and mentoring through meetings with successful women in business as well as an insider's look at the Sea Island Company. Many thanks to UGA Foundation Trustee Betsy Camp (J.D.'77) and UGA Alumni Association President Bonney Shuman for their efforts toward this program.

D.C. students visit principal deputy solicitor general

Students enrolled in the law school's Washington, D.C. Semester In Practice take up residence in our nation's capital, during which time they earn course credit and work in placements with government agencies, private nonprofits and judicial chambers. Here, a group meets with Jeff Wall (center), who serves as principal deputy solicitor general at the U.S. Department of Justice.

Harvey named among national law students of the year

Third-year student Marcol Harvey was featured in The National Jurist's Spring 2018 issue as one of 20 law students across the country who contributed the most to their law schools and communities in the past year. Photo by UGA's Chad Osburn.
